Skin and soft tissue infections (SSTIs) are often complicated by polymicrobial gram-positive and gram-negative species. Furthermore, the burden of SSTIs is increasing. In this respect SSTIs differ significantly from other infections which are more commonly caused by monomicrobial pathogens and respond well to optimal antimicrobial treatment. Inappropriate empiric antimicrobial treatment is associated with increased health care costs, mortality, length of hospital stay and antibiotic resistance. The most common SSTI is skin and soft tissue infection of the leg and foot, which is treated mainly by antimicrobial treatment of the foot. When treating SSTIs the clinician often has to take a lot of clinical information into account, such as distribution and severity of the infection and the choice of antimicrobial agents which must also be compatible with hospital conditions. I maintain that two factors are especially responsible for this particular kind of cognitive innovation: (a) the recognition that all human knowledge is a linguistic game and the attendant
